THE HEART OF MAN.

If angels might unroll the heart of man
Petal by petal to its immost fold,
Seeking divinely for its hidden gold—
As babes pluck wide the perfect bud, who can
No more give back the delicate life that ran Through every veinlet, waiting for the sun—
How would they weep, if blighted one by one
They found that nearest to the core began Foul insult to the Maker, who made fair
The perfect thing, with all its folded powers,
Gave it a king-sin—freehold of heaven's air,
To make earth fragrant in its opening hours—
And veiling their shamed faces, homeward rise
To lose the memory of such loss in blossoming paradise!

paradise! -Alyn Y. Keith in Kate Field's Washington.

CAPTAIN B.

I do not recollect, in all my acquaintance with military men, to have met with but one person holding a commission in the honorable service of arms in whom was combined all the skill and accomplish-ments of a true soldier with the incorri-gible cowardice of the meanest poltroon.

This unenviable character was possessed by Captain B. I first became acquainted by Captain B. I first became acquainted with this officer at Comargo, where his regiment arrived a few days before the army moved forward to Monterey. He was full of wit and vivacity, and consequently a favorite with his regiment.

When the order for our hasty preparations for the advance was promulgated, no one was more clated, apparently, than Captain B., during the march no officer was more cheerful and sanguine of the result of the fierce struggle in which we expected to be engaged before the walls of the strongly defended city.

But alast for poor Captain B., his courage did not remain at the sticking point after we arrived in sight of the enemy. Our general was so favorably impressed with his soldlerlike appearance during the march and the perfect discipline of his men that he selected him, with a portion of his company, to form a reconnoitering party.

Unfortunately, just as the party had en-

Unfortunately, just as the party had entered a narrow gully in front of the works, he was suddenly attacked with a violent spasm of the stomach, which rendered it impossible for him to proceed another step. The disease, he declared, he had had several twinges of before, and attributed it to the poor water of the country. eral twinges of before, and attributed it to the poor water of the country, together with the fatigue of his previous marches. Requesting his lieutenant to conduct the recomoisance as directed by the general, Captain B. threw himself on the ground, under cover of the banks, and patiently awaited the return of his men. When they had accomplished their objects and returned to the gully they found the cap-tain in perfect health and spirits, and re-turning at their head he reported the re-sults of his examination with so much mi-muteness as to receive the special thanks of the commander.

nuteness as to receive the special thanks of the commander.

The duty was performed, as the gallant old general supposed, with so much fearlessness and prompitude on the part of Captain B, that he determined the next morning, when the action commenced in carnest, to give him with his regiment a peculiarly honorable position in the storming of the lower part of the city.

With cool and manly hearing did this really dine looking officer place himself at the head of his brave men and move on with his regiment. But scarcely had it entered the outskirts of the suburbs, under cover of the cane plantations and corn entered the outskirts of the suburbs, un-der cover of the cane plantations and corn fleids and attracted the fire of the enemy, than he suddenly disappeared.

About two hours after the advance of the Blank regiment a soldler whose duty it was to attend the surgeon's attendants, in bringing in the wounded from the various points of the field, stepped up to me with a request that I would come immediately to a young officer who, dangerously wound-ed, was lying in a house close at band to a young officer who, dangerously wounded, was lying in a house close at hand.

I hastened to the spot indicated by the man, and on entering the house found Captain B. lying apparently insensible upon a bianket. A few stains of blood were discoverable upon his face, and his white linen trousers were considerably colored with dirt and blood commingled, as if he had drawn himself painfully over the uneven ground to his present shelter.

I tore open his coat, and removing his shirt bosom passed my hand carefully over his person, but without discovering either wound nor contusion.

over his person, but without discovering either wound nor contusion.

"Ah, my dear doctor, is that you? How kind you are. Tell me, how long have I been lying here? But don't stay any longer—I know my brave fellows, many of them, need your services. Hurry off to them, I pray, and let medie, for I feel that I am past your help. Yes, doctor, I am a dying man. Oh, is it not glorious thus to die at one's post? But break it gently to them, doctor—to my friends at home, I mean; don't put my name among the put my name among the killed; but only report me wounded, 'dan-gerously wounded'—you understand. It might be too great a shock to their loving hearts to learn too abruptly that I was killed—so please, dear doctor, enter me on your list as 'dangerously wounded.'"

"But Captain B.," I answered, "I cannot report you at all, until I ascertain the nature of your injuries. Where were you wounded?"

"Why, my, door, follow" said, he so he will be seen by

"Why, my dear fellow," said he, as he made a painful effort to turn upon his side, "as to that I can't say as I was exactly hit-but-but". "But what, sir?" I exclaimed, now becoming extremely disgusted with the fel-low's poltroonery. "Answer me quickly, for there are many brave men about who are actually requiring my services, answer me quickly. me quickly."

"Why, my esteemed friend, I think it was here," said he as he placed his hand upon his breast. "I think it must have been a round shot from one of the enemy's battery guns, for it seems as if my breast bone was broken in—that is to say, it must have been a spent shot."

"But there is no mark of it there." I

"Oh, no. I suppose not, doctor, for now that I think of it, I presume it was only the wind of it that knocked me senseless. the wind of it that knocked me senseless. I believe there are many similar instances mentioned in your books. You can make a note of this if you choose: 'Captain B., of the Blank regiment, in the storming of Monterey, knocked insensible by the wind of a 9-pound shot, and though rendered hors de combat for the time not materially injured.'"

As I turned, away to return to the spot.

As I turned away to return to the spot where my brother surgeons were occupied in dressing the wounds of really brave men, I was so completely disgusted with the absolutely unnatural meanness of Captain B.'s conduct that I determined for the honor of the noble corps to which he belonged and the service generally not to mention it to any living soul, but on the mention it to any living soul, but on the following day reported him in my list of casualties as very slightly disabled, but not specifying from what cause.

The next morning as I passed his tent, around which were a number of his friends congratulating him upon his lucky escape, I was obliged to disguise my feelings toward him, and return his very polite, but ward him, and return his very polite, but excessively impudent salutation.

At length by some inexplicable means, which I could never divine, the conduct of Captain B., at Monterey began to be whispered about, and his brothers in arms at first began to treat him with marked coolness. But his fund of wit and good humor was so great—and his having before been so great a favorite with all who knew him—and besides his really soldierly qualities being so numerous they readily by a tacit agreement determined to throw the veil of charity over the affair. In a few months it was nearly forgotten; and at all events ceased to form a subject of camp conversation.

events ceased to form a subject of camp conversation.

But we were no sooner in for it at the fiercely contested field of Buena Vista, and the round shot and copper grape of the enemy hailed furiously into the head of our advancing columns and our brave fellows began to drop like grass before the mower's seythe, than I observed an officer of the Blank regiment spring suddenly forward as if mortally wounded into a narrow ravine, upon the brink of which it had arrived.

"There," thought I, "goes another noble fellow to his long home." But when I heard the word passed from mouth to mouth along the line, "It's Captain B, poor fellow!" I reserved my sympathy for more deserving objects, well satisfied in my mind that he for that time was in safe quarters. But shortly after his comrades had crossed the ravine and successfully charged the batteries on the other side I distinguished that officer emerging cautiously from the smoke that filled the gorge and joining his company, and with cap in one hand and sword in the other he cheered and huzzaed as vociferously as the bravest man there. There," thought I, "goes another noble cap in one hand and sword in the other he cheered and huzzaed as vociferously as the bravest man there.

No sooner, however, did his column receive an order to attack another position of the enemy, where the guns were belching forth torrents of grape and canister, than I again caught a moment from my own immediate duties to look after Captain B., for I feit an unaccountable curiosity in regard to his motions. But this time I could not see him at the head of his company. Presently, however, I again perceived his peculiarly lithe and handsome figure gliding cautiously along the broken ground and once more seeking the shelter of the gorge. My indignation was now so great that I would have rejoiced to see him fall pierced with wounds. In fact, I was so incensed at this last act, so disgraceful to his gallant regiment, that, watching an opportunity when I could be best spared from my post, I mounted my horse and spurred across the plateau in the direction of the skulking place of the craven hearted captain, with the determination of shaming him, if possible, to a sense of his cowardly conduct.

nation of shaming him, if possible, to a sense of his cowardly conduct.

I had no sooner reached the edge of the ravine where I could take in a view of the ground below, then I espied him snugly ensconsed under the shelter of the rocky wall.

"Captain B.," I exclaimed, "are you wounded, sir?"

"Captain B.," I exclaimed, "are you wounded, sir?"

"A-a-you here, my good friend? No, not exactly wounded—that is, not shot—but this confounded fall has nearly knocked the breath out of me. I believe, doctor, I have broken a rib or two."

"Twas the wind of another ball, sir, I reckon." said I, now beginning to be really amused at the fellow's downright cool effontery. "Now, sir, come out of that forthwith and rejoin your company, or, by heavens, I'll trumpet your base poltroonery to the whole army."

At this moment I perceived the general and his staff moving directly toward the spot where I was standing, and now I actually begged the captain, for the honor of his corps, not to be found by the brave general thus shirking his duty. But before he had time to withdraw from the spot the general had arrived, and observing me thus alone on the edge of the ravine, inquired why I was there. I would not be guilty of prevarication, and pointed to the ravine below, where still remained the skulking officer. guity of prevariation, and pointed to the ravine below, where still remained the skulking officer.

"Who is that person, doctor?" he demanded on seeing the captain entirely manied on seeing the captain entirely alone.

"Captain B., sir," I replied.

"Is he wounded? Here, my men"—calling to some orderlies—"assist that gentleman from the ravine to the plateau here; and, doctor, have the goodness to examine his injuries," and as the general turned to give some order to one of the aids-de-camp, the men sprang to the bottom of the ravine, and placing their arms under those of the captain, dragged him to the upper world. I immediately proceeded to examine his person, really hoping in pity to him to discover some injury, but the result was as I expected.

to discover some injury, but the result was as I expected.
"Well, doctor, I hope he is not badly hurt?" commiseratingly inquired the good, kind hearted general.

I shook my head.

"What, is it serious?" he asked, as he sprang from his horse and approached the "Alas, general" I said, "I am sorry to say it—he is not injured at all; and with shame I have to add, sir, this is not the first time I have been called upon to ex-amine him underlike circumstances, with a similar result!" "Isit possible that a craven heart beats in an American bosom this day? an American losson this day? Here, sergeant," turning toward a squadron of dragoons in attendance, "take this officer under arrest. Bear him to the rear, sergeant. Gentlemen, I should not have believed this if I had not seen it with my own

At this moment, attracted by the sight of a general officer surrounded by his at-tendants, the enemy had directed one of his mortars upon the spot, and as the dra-goon was about obeying the order an 18-inch shell burst directly over our heads and sent a shower of death dealing missile into our ranks. The sergeant was killed on the spot, and one of the horses of Major Bliss was desperately wounded.

Scarcely had the report of this shell died away, when it was followed by another, that struck just about the verge of the ravine. Simultaneously with its report a frightful shriek of mingled terror and pain burst upon our ears, and the mangled and lifeless form of Captain B. fell directly between the feet of Old Whitney, the general's gallant war steed. "Is it possible?" exclaimed the old chief.

"Poor fellow: he has escaped a terrible exposure—one that would have deeply morti-fied his comrades, as well as his worthy family at home. Let us hope, gentlemen, that at the great court above his sentene will be much more lenient than would have been the finding of a court martial. -S. C. S. in Buffalo News.
